

WILLS AND PROBATE

Many people still mistakenly believe that if they die without making a will (i.e. “intestate”), their loved ones automatically inherit.

Be warned – if you do die intestate, your property will be divided up according to antiquated rules that in some circumstances could mean, for example, that your own children could end up with nothing if you are divorced.

Wills are the only way to ensure that you decide who gets what after you die.

We, at Sibbalds, believe that, as we are already very familiar with our clients’ financial and personal circumstances, we are in an ideal position to advise them on the completion of their wills.

Apart from their personal wishes, we ensure that clients’ wills are drafted to take into account their potential inheritance tax position.

Our services in this important area also include obtaining probate on behalf of the executors, as well as acting as executors when requested to do so by clients.

With our existing knowledge of clients’ financial and personal affairs, we are able to offer the “one-stop shop” approach with our will writing, probate and executorship services.
